Scene: The Afterglow

INT. COFFEE SHOP - DAY

SOUND of gentle jazz, clatter of cups

MAYA (16, looks younger, dressed in slightly ill-fitting, but clean clothes) sits opposite JAXON (40s, sharp suit, impeccably groomed, a predatory charm in his eyes). Empty coffee cups and a half-eaten pastry sit between them. Jaxon has been talking for a while, his voice a smooth, captivating purr. Maya is mesmerized, her initial nervousness giving way to a hopeful, almost dazed expression.

<center>JAXON</center>

> ...and that's the thing, Maya. You have something truly, profoundly special. It's not just a look; it's an aura. A story in your eyes that agencies would kill for. Raw. Unfiltered. Authentic.

Maya blushes, a tiny, almost imperceptible smile.

<center>MAYA</center>

> You really think so? I just? I don't know. I've never thought about it like this.

<center>JAXON</center>

> That's exactly why you're perfect. You're unspoiled. Untouched by the cynicism of the industry. Most girls your age are already trying to be something. You just are. And that, my dear, is gold. Pure gold.

He leans forward, his voice dropping slightly, becoming more intimate.

<center>JAXON</center>

> Now, we have an incredible window of opportunity opening up. A client in Paris, high-fashion, a major campaign. They're looking for a fresh face, exactly like yours, for their spring collection. But they move fast. Very fast.

Maya's eyes widen.

<center>MAYA</center>

> Paris? Wow. But? how fast? I mean, my parents? they'd never let me just-

<center>JAXON</center>

> (Cutting her off gently, with a reassuring smile)

> And they shouldn't. They're your parents, it's their job to worry. They love you. But they don't understand this world, Maya. They don't understand that when an opportunity like this knocks, you don't ask it to wait while you pack a suitcase and get permission slips. You open the door.

He takes a sip of water, allowing a beat for his words to sink in.

<center>JAXON</center>

> To make this happen, we need to be nimble. We need to be decisive. And most importantly, we need to be completely focused. This isn't a hobby, Maya. This is your destiny calling.

He gestures vaguely, as if to encompass the world beyond the coffee shop window.

<center>JAXON</center>

> To secure your place, the agency needs to have your passport. It's a standard procedure. A sign of your commitment, yes, but also a practical necessity for visas, work permits, the whole nine yards. It shows them you're serious, that you're ready to dive in. I'll personally handle all the paperwork, all the red tape. You won't have to lift a finger.

Maya chews on her lip, a flicker of hesitation in her eyes.

<center>MAYA</center>

> My passport? I mean, I can get it. But? to just hand it over?

<center>JAXON</center>

> (Softly, almost fatherly)

> Think of it as taking the first step on a journey. You wouldn't expect to fly to Paris without it, would you? And entrust it to me? Maya, I'm your advocate. Your mentor. Your guide. My entire reputation is built on nurturing talent like yours. You're safe with me. More than safe. You're about to be launched.

He pauses, then leans in again, his tone becoming earnest, almost conspiratorial.

<center>JAXON</center>

> Now, there's one more thing. And this is crucial for your success. For the first few weeks, while you're getting settled, learning the ropes, meeting the right people, we need a period of absolute, uninterrupted focus. This industry is cutthroat. It demands everything. You'll be working long hours, doing fittings, shoots, meeting designers? it's a whirlwind.

<center>MAYA</center>

> So? no phone calls home?

<center>JAXON</center>

> (Nods slowly, a regretful but firm expression)

> Exactly. For a short while. It's not about being secretive, Maya. It's about protecting you. Your parents, bless their hearts, they'll worry. They'll call, they'll text, they'll want updates. And every call, every conversation, will pull you away. Pull you out of the zone. It's a distraction you simply can't afford right now.

He reaches across the table, covering her hand briefly with his own. His touch is warm, reassuring.

<center>JAXON</center>

> Imagine trying to learn a complex new language while constantly translating back to your old one. You need to immerse yourself. Completely. This is your chance to shed the old, embrace the new. To become the global force you're destined to be. We'll set you up with a burner phone, for agency contact only, no outside distractions. Just for a few weeks. Think of it as a professional detox. A cocoon where you can truly transform.

<center>MAYA</center>
> But? they'll be so worried. They'll think?

<center>JAXON</center>
> (Squeezes her hand gently)
> They'll miss you. Of course they will. But imagine their faces, Maya, when you call them after those few weeks. Not as the girl who left, but as the rising star who returned. Polished. Confident. On the cusp of something extraordinary. You'll explain everything then. They'll understand. They'll be so incredibly proud. This isn't about shutting them out; it's about making them proud beyond their wildest dreams. It's a sacrifice, yes. But every great success story has its sacrifices. Are you ready to make yours?

Maya looks into his eyes, searching for something, finding only unwavering confidence and a reflection of her own burgeoning hope. The dream of Paris, of being "special," glows in her mind. The thought of her parents' pride is a powerful lure. The discomfort of the request is softened by the promise of an unimaginable future.

<center>MAYA</center>
> Okay. Yes. I'm ready.

Jaxon smiles, a slow, satisfied grin that doesn't quite reach his eyes. He squeezes her hand one last time before letting go.

<center>JAXON</center>
> Excellent. I knew you had it in you. This is the first step, Maya. The very first step on the road to everything.

Scene: Café Booth - Late Afternoon

INT. QUIET CAFÉ - LATE AFTERNOON

The café is mostly empty, bathed in the soft, fading light of a grey afternoon. MARTHA (16, beautiful but clearly self-conscious, dressed in slightly ill-fitting clothes) sits opposite MARCUS THORNE (40s, immaculately dressed in expensive, understated clothing, with sharp, watchful eyes that miss nothing). A half-empty latte sits between them. Marcus exudes an aura of professional calm and quiet authority.

<center>MARCUS</center>

> (Leaning forward slightly, his voice a low, soothing murmur)

> Martha, darling, you have no idea how rare your look is. Truly. It's that blend of innocence and? well, something utterly captivating. Most girls, they try too hard. You? You just are.

Martha blushes, her gaze dropping to her hands. She picks at a loose thread on her sleeve.

<center>MARTHA</center>

> I don't know. My mom says I'm pretty, but?

<center>MARCUS</center>

> Your mom sees her daughter. I see raw talent. A canvas waiting for the right artist. And believe me, darling, the world is desperate for new canvases right now. Think Paris. Milan. The covers you see in magazines, the campaigns you dream about? that's where you belong.

He slides a sleek tablet across the table. On the screen is a mock-up of Martha's face, artfully shot and retouched, looking impossibly sophisticated and ethereal. Martha's eyes widen.

<center>MARTHA</center>

> Is that? me?

<center>MARCUS</center>

> (A warm, reassuring smile)

> It's the Martha I see. The Martha the world will see. But to get there, we need to move fast. This isn't a game for the timid, sweetie. Opportunities like this, they don't wait.

He gestures vaguely with his hand, as if dismissing the ordinary world outside the cafe.

<center>MARCUS</center>

> Now, to get you into our intensive program - the fast track, the one that guarantees you a spot in front of the top agencies - there are a few practicalities. Nothing scary, just logistical. The first is your passport.

Martha's head snaps up, a flicker of apprehension in her eyes.

<center>MARTHA</center>

> My passport? Why?

<center>MARCUS</center>

> (Meeting her gaze, his expression earnest)

> Purely for administrative purposes. We handle all the travel arrangements, visa applications if needed, all the paperwork. Think of it like a safety deposit box for your future. We secure it, ensure all your documents are in order for international travel, for potential contracts. It shows you're serious, you're committed. It shows us you're ready to embrace this journey fully. We need to get the process started immediately to lock in your slot.

He pauses, letting his words sink in, then lowers his voice conspiratorially.

<center>MARCUS</center>

> And then there's the other thing. The? contact.

Martha's brow furrows.

<center>MARTHA</center>

> My parents? They'll want to know what's happening. They'll want to talk to me.

<center>MARCUS</center>

> (Reaching across the table, his hand gently covering hers for a brief, comforting moment)

> And they will, Martha. In time. But this initial phase, this crucial jumpstart? it requires absolute, undistracted focus. Think of it as an immersion. Like an athlete in Olympic training. You wouldn't call your mom after every single sprint, would you? You're there to train, to become.

He withdraws his hand, picking up his own coffee cup.

<center>MARCUS</center>

> Your parents, bless their hearts, they love you. But they don't understand this world. They don't understand the demands, the sacrifices. They'll worry, they'll ask a million questions, they'll project their own fears onto you. And that? that noise? it can be crippling for a new talent. It pulls you away from the work, from connecting with your inner self, from developing that raw potential.

He sips his coffee, his gaze never leaving her face.

<center>MARCUS</center>

> For the first few weeks, just to get you properly established, fully immersed in the training, the shoots, the networking? we ask for a clean break. No calls home. No texts. Just you, your mentors, and the work. It's not about cutting them off forever, Martha. It's about creating a sacred space for your burgeoning career to flourish without external pressures. It's about protecting you.

Martha looks torn, a battle raging between her apprehension and the glittering promise in Marcus's words.

<center>MARTHA</center>

> But? they'll be so upset. They'll think?

<center>MARCUS</center>

> (Cutting her off gently, his voice firm but empathetic)

> They'll think exactly what we tell them, once you're ready to re-emerge, glowing with newfound confidence and a portfolio that will astound them. We'll handle it. We'll send them an official letter, explaining the intensive nature of the program, the strict focus required. They'll understand. They'll know you're safe, looked after, thriving. They'll be incredibly proud when they see the results, trust me.

He leans in again, his voice dropping to an almost hypnotic whisper.

AuditAI Enterprise

<center>MARCUS</center>

> This is a sacrifice, yes. A small one, for the biggest reward of your life. It's you, Martha, proving to yourself - and to the world - that you're ready to fly. You're not a child anymore, darling. This is your chance to step into your own power, to truly become who you're meant to be. Don't let old ways of thinking hold you back. Do you trust me? Do you trust yourself?

He slides a pristine, thick contract across the table, tapping the signature line with his pen.

<center>MARCUS</center>

> Just for a few weeks, Martha. To build the foundation of your empire. It's a brave step. The bravest step. But it's the one that will change your life. Your passport, and your unwavering focus. That's all I need.

Martha looks at the contract, then back at Marcus, her initial fear slowly dissolving into a fragile, hopeful determination. She nods, a silent, momentous decision.

<center>MARTHA</center>

> Okay. Okay, I? I trust you.

She reaches for her backpack, her hands trembling slightly, beginning to rummage for her passport. Marcus watches her, a faint, almost imperceptible smirk playing at the corner of his lips.
